Close the gender funding gap

Women are more likely to give—but less likely to receive philanthropic funding

Research from Indiana University's Women's Philanthropy Institute shows that historically women across income levels and generations are more likely than men to give, yet the 47,449 organizations dedicated to women and girls in the US received only 1.9% of charitable giving in 2018.

Women and girls of color are leading us all forward

According to the Philanthropic Initiative for Racial Equity, "women of color across the country are leading justice movements that bring positive lasting impact for all in our communities."

Yet only a tiny fraction of foundation funding is directed to women and girls of color

In 2017, grantmaking to women and girls of color totaled about 0.5% ($356 million) of the $66.9 billion given by foundations, equating to $5.48 per woman or girl of color in the US (Pocket Change: How Women and Girls of Color Do More With Less).

So women and girls of color have to make the most of scarce resources

According to Pocket Change: How Women and Girls of Color Do More With Less, 4.5% of organizations by and for women and girls of color have no revenue, and 26.2% have annual revenue less than $50,000.

Let's #GiveWomen our support to help close this gender funding gap

The GiveWomen guide features organizations led by and focused on self-identified women and/or gender-expansive people. When planning your year-end donations, please consider supporting their critical work. Thank you for your generosity!
